Do you feel like you didn't do anything this year?

You did more than you think you did. You accomplished more than you remember. Often you've forgotten how much you wanted something, because you got it in March and that particular yearning vanished.

This exercise is your proof. Write down 100 things you did, accomplished, learned, survived, released and enjoyed this year. It's harder than it sounds for the first twenty, and then it starts to pour out.

Where 100 Things came from

When I had a baby and a preschooler, my then-husband had the nerve to give me crap about how I'd been doing "nothing."

"Nothing" is the word my wasband and our culture use for mothers' labor: typically necessary, invisible, dirty, never-ending and unglamorous labor. Labor like keeping children alive, breastfeeding with our bodies, teaching preschoolers to read, driving them to daycare and school, mountains of laundry, endless tidying, planning meals and shopping. All of those tasks are relegated to "nothing."

So I sat down and made a list of what I had done that year, which included starting a business and a blog and substitute teaching, and I came up with well over 100 things I had done that year.

My ex-husband was unmoved. But the exercise made me feel like a total badass. I felt validated when I looked at the 100 things on that list.

Now celebrate

Read your list out loud. Then celebrate it: dress up, take yourself out, toast how far you've come. When you notice and celebrate what you want, you get more of it.
